Wardrobe Framework

One area to review in your wardrobe is to build a consistent, intentional style.

Wardrobe Balance

One of the biggest reasons getting dressed feels difficult isn't because you don't have enough clothes—it's because your wardrobe is out of balance.

A balanced wardrobe isn't about owning a specific number of garments. It's about understanding the role each piece plays and making sure those roles reflect your own style.

Every wardrobe is made up of three types of pieces:

Classic: These are the pieces that define your style.
A classic isn't the traditional "wardrobe essential" you'll find in magazines. It's a garment that consistently feels like you and forms the foundation of your wardrobe.
These are the pieces you'll happily wear season after season, often buying again in different colours, fabrics or variations because they work so well for you.

Fashion: These are the pieces that bring personality, interest and freshness to your outfits.
They don't have to follow trends. A fashion piece is simply one that creates impact within your style.
For one person, wide-leg jeans might be a fashion piece. For someone else, they might already be a classic.
The category depends entirely on the individual.

Basic: Basics are the supporting pieces that connect everything together.
They help balance your outfits and allow your classics and fashion pieces to shine.
Basics don't have to be neutral or conventional. A white T-shirt or trench coat isn't automatically a basic for everyone. Your basics are the garments that naturally support the rest of your wardrobe.

Exercise

Go through your wardrobe and classify your clothes into these three categories:

Classics

Fashion Pieces

Basics

When you've finished, step back and observe the balance.

Do you have enough classics to support your style?

Do your fashion pieces reflect the identity you want to express?

Do you have the basics needed to connect everything together?

There is no perfect ratio. The goal is to create a balance that works for your wardrobe and the way you want to dress.

You've got it!

I hope this framework has helped you identify the elements of your wardrobe that already work for you, as well as the areas you'd like to develop.
Creating a consistent style isn't about starting over or buying more. It's about becoming more intentional with the clothes you already own and the choices you make from now on.
Taking the time to understand your wardrobe can completely change the way you get dressed. I hope this is the beginning of a style that feels more like you—one built with consistency, intention and confidence.

These six step is just the beginning.
If you've enjoyed looking at your wardrobe through a more strategic lens, imagine what we could achieve by working together.
My programmes take this framework much further, helping you build a wardrobe that reflects your identity with confidence, clarity and intention.
I'd love to help you take that next step.
